Bill Frerking is vice president and chief sustainability officer (CSO) of Georgia-Pacific, one of the world’s leading manufacturers and marketers of tissue, packaging, pulp, paper, building products and related chemicals.

As CSO, he is responsible for Georgia-Pacific’s overall sustainability efforts, including working with the company’s business units and procurement and staff groups to develop and implement sustainability strategies, goals, measurement and reporting. He chairs Georgia-Pacific’s Sustainability Council and represents the company in sustainability discussions with customers and other groups.

Frerking is active in various sustainability efforts on behalf of Georgia-Pacific, including The Sustainability Consortium; Dartmouth College Tuck School of Business Executive Environmental Sustainability Forum; Sustainability 50; AHC Group; and the Metropolitan Atlanta Chamber of Commerce Environmental Policy and Sustainability Committee.

Frerking joined Georgia-Pacific in 2006 as chief counsel for the company’s building products businesses. He had previously been with Koch Cellulose, where he had served as vice president, general counsel and corporate secretary since 2004. Prior to that, he held positions in the law department of Koch Industries Inc. and other Koch companies, focusing on environmental compliance. Frerking was the primary architect of the changes Koch companies made beginning in the mid-1990s in how they approached environmental compliance. He then helped apply that same approach to all compliance areas as Koch companies developed compliance offices in each of their businesses.

Before joining Koch in 1996, Frerking was a partner in private legal practice in Kansas City, Missouri, where he practiced for 10 years in securities and mergers and acquisitions work before specializing in environmental law. He remains a member of the Missouri Bar, the State Bar of Georgia and the Bar of the U.S. Supreme Court.
